The IIJA presents a unique and not to be missed opportunity to address water-related climate resilience in the Colorado River Basin. The Act provides significant additional funding for existing federal programs as well as authorizing and funding new programs. The programs are housed in a variety of federal agencies and, for some of the programs, the agencies are required to provide spending plans to Congress before distribution of funds can begin.

This fact sheet is focused on federal programs that are accessible to tribal governments. For more information on the details of these programs and others that are accessible to state and local governments and non-governmental organizations, go to www.tenstrategies.net.
